Abstract

This study aims to describe, explore, and analyze the local wisdom of noken as a symbol of Papuan culture which holds a significant religious-spiritual meaning for the Papuan. It employed a qualitative research design, relying on primary data from interviews and observations of women who produce and use noken within Papuan society. The participants are those who play influential roles in the community, such as religious and community figures, and the experts noken production. The findings revealed that noken is a vital aspect of Papuan life, serving as a vessel and source of life that embodies religious-spiritual values. It is widely regarded as a symbol of God’s love for the people of Papua, instilling a sense of faith and hope in the Creator. Furthermore, noken is also considered to be a second womb, as infants are placed in noken for growth and development until they begin crawling. In addition, a specific type of noken is crafted for children to promote honesty. For generations, noken has been an integral part of Papuan life, passed down and taught as a crucial aspect of life. Therefore, it is considered a symbolic representation of God’s inclusion and preservation of Papuan life. The Papuan ancestors used to be explorers who inhabited the island and utilized the regional language of the tribes, Ugatame, to teach the art of noken weaving. It serves as a reminder that God is the Creator of the heavens, the earth, and humans, and that they are made within His image.

Keywords: noken, local wisdom, cultural symbol, religious value, representation

INTRODUCTION

Noken has gained worldwide prominence and recognition since it was designated as an intangible cultural heritage of Indonesia by UNESCO on December 4th, 2012 (Avianto et al., 2021). This recognition has bestowed legal certainty for the protection, acceptance, and support of the preservation of noken as an ancestral cultural heritage that contributes to the local Papuan identity and embodies noble values of life (Brauchler, 2014; Lefaan, 2022; T. Pekei, 2013). Noken serves as a medium for Papuans to connect individually and collectively (Foley, 2014; Kayame, 2022). In this context, vigorous community participation in preserving cultural heritage is crucial. As a signatory to the convention for the safeguarding of the intangible cultural heritage, Indonesia is committed to preserving its cultural legacy through various measures, including protection, promotion, and transmission of knowledge (Brauchler, 2014; Diana & Tiaraputri, 2020).

Noken holds an important place in the daily lives of the Papuan people, fulfilling multiple functions such as transportation for collecting and carrying goods like crops, food, and daily necessities, as well as serving as a baby carrier (Lefaan, 2022; Salhuteru & Hutubessy, 2020).

The art of making a noken has been transmitted from generation to generation by Papuan tribal ancestors. It continues to be practiced today using raw materials derived from the surrounding natural environment in Papua. The raw materials are from various regions, including hills, inland areas, coasts, and comprise tree fibers, bark, swamp grass, rattam stems, and pandan leaves from the forest (Wanma et al., 2013; Zebua et al., 2020). In the Papuan Indigenous community, noken is generally made by women, who are referred to as "mama-mama noken" (noken-making moms). This practice has been passed down for hundreds of years in seven customary territories (Ranst, 2018; Suryawan, 2017).

Noken, as a traditional bag made of tree fiber and bark, holds significant meaning in the lives of Papuan people. It represents local wisdom and serves as a symbol of Papuan culture, embodying many noble values. Furthermore, it is utilized in various aspects of traditional ceremonies (Wanma et al., 2013). One aspect of the values highlighted in this study is the high religious and spiritual values of the people of Papua.

This research aims to describe, explore, and analyze the religious value that Papuans understand and internalize. To accomplish this goal, the researchers formulated three research questions as a guide to elaborate on the intended topic, namely:

a) what are the values and meanings of noken for Papuans?

b) how is noken regarded as a cultural symbol of religious-spiritual values among Papuans?

c) what are the implications of noken's religious-spiritual values for developing religious life among Papuan communities?

This study focuses on answering the three research questions outlined above, offering novel insights, and expanding knowledge on the religious aspects of noken.

This study begins with the premise that noken manifests the Papuans’ Indigenous wisdom, religious beliefs, and cultural heritage, reflecting their profound connection and love for the Creator through His creation. One example is the abundance of tree bark, which only grows in Papua’s natural environment and can be utilized as the community’s primary resource for producing noken. Noken is more than just superficially understood as a unique traditional bag of tree fiber. It also carries significant spiritual values and meanings that are extremely important to the lives of Papuans. Noken connects and establishes horizontal relationships among Papuans and signifies vertical relationships, the spiritual connection between Papuans and God. Noken serves as a sign of God’s love for humanity, preserving, guaranteeing, and sustaining the livelihood of Papuans from their ancestors to the present.

Literature Review

Currently, existing research on noken has focused on the following three aspects. Firstly, studies that examine noken from the perspective of democratic politics (Brauchler, 2014; Nugraha, 2021; Setyanto et al., 2020; Yunus, 2020). The literature has shown that the noken is more than just a local identity; it is also a cultural heritage of global culture. The noken system is a product of strengthening cultural, political, and local democracy. In other words, the noken system elaborates the constitution that provides space for the social diversity in Indonesian society. Secondly, the literature shows that noken has evolved into a source of income and a creative economic force that has succeeded in ensuring the well-being of the Papuan people for decades. (Avianto et al., 2021; Risamasu et al., 2019; Salhuteru & Hutubessy, 2020). Third, a gender-based study of noken reveals that the continued existence of noken is due to the tireless efforts and active participation of Papuan women. They are committed to preserving their noken weaving skills and passing them down to the younger generation. Thus, Papuan women have become a crucial representation of the significance of women's identity in preserving the noken. Accordingly, it is critical to treat women's rights with the same respect and equality as men. The marginalization of Papuan women in society’s social fabric presents a challenge that is hard to reconcile with societal norms and values (Kanem & Norris, 2018; Marit, 2016; Riyana et al., 2020). Previous research needs to pay more attention to the theological and spiritual implications of noken, indicating that scholars have neglected the religious values of noken that stem from Papua's natural beauty. As a result, there needs to be more literature examining noken from a religious standpoint.
This study aims to fill this void and add to the existing knowledge on the subject.

Conceptual Framework

This study on noken delves deeper into how the Papuan people perceive, experience, and live the spiritual values of noken. To achieve these aims and objectives, the researcher uses a representation lens with the initial assumption that everyone has their own perception and mental construction. The term “representation” refers to an object, idea, concept, or relationship that an individual possesses. In the context of this study, the focus is on noken. Thus, representation explains that humans gain their experience of the world not directly but through the representations created and utilized. This representation can influence how humans respond to and behave towards the world around them. This influence is affected by culture, experience, and social context (Celis & Mazur, 2012; Mansbridge, 2011; Saward, 2006).

RESEARCH METHOD

This study employed a qualitative research design, relying on primary and secondary data. The secondary data source was relevant literature on the topic of noken research. At the same time, the primary data was obtained through in-depth interviews at the participants’ houses. The participants of this study consisted of religious figures, prominent community figures, and mama-mama noken at the Noken Iwin Miobo workshop, which serves as the central location for noken production in Jayapura, Papua. They were purposively selected based on the consideration that the noken-making mothers have direct involvement in producing noken, while the religious and community figures play a key role in instilling the spiritual values of noken into the social life of Papua.

The name of the noken workshop, Iwin Miobo, is derived from the local Kurudu language, where “Iwin” means “Woman” and “Miobo” means “Island”. Thus, Iwin Miobo can be interpreted as “Island Woman”. Traditionally, the people of Kurudu refer to themselves in their local language as Iwin Miobo, which means “Island Woman”. The noken weavers who work at this workshop are women from Kurudu Island who now reside in Jayapura after migrating from their home island.

The data collection took place from October 2022 to early 2023. It began with literature review focusing on the previous research about noken, by gathering relevant literature.

The techniques used for analyzing the data in this study involved three stages, namely: (a) data reduction, which refers to organizing the data thematically to make it more systematic; (b) data display, which involves presenting the research results in the interview excerpts; and (c) data verification, which entails checking the trends obtained from the data during the collection process. The data processed through these three stages were then analyzed using descriptive and content analysis. Firstly, data description served as the basis for the interpretive process, which was conducted contextually. Secondly, the analysis in this study followed the research process conducted by Spradley (2000). The stages and techniques used in this study were employed to formulate conclusions.

DISCUSSION

This study found that non-locals generally perceive noken as having no value other than a simple bag worn for everyday use. On the other hand, in the context of Papuans’ social life, noken carries many deep values and meanings for its people. Based on the interviews conducted with the participants, the following knowledge of the Papuan community was revealed:

a) Women in Papua must weave noken. Given this context, one could suggest that noken and women are inseparable and that their social bond is attached and deeply rooted. Equally important, the level of proficiency in weaving noken is considered a prerequisite for a Papuan woman to be ready for marriage. In a broader sense, the more delicately a woman weaves noken, the more highly she is regarded. Moreover, her status will become even more elevated if she manages the household, displays maturity, and exhibits a good attitude (Interview with community figures, February 20th, 2023 and mama-mama noken, November 18th, 2022).

b) In social context, noken is utilized as a bag or pouch used for storing and carrying things and as a cupboard for storing foods. When food supplies run low, they will gather and store food inside the noken, which they treat like a food barn. Besides, noken also embodies the values of honesty and respect for one’s and others’ belongings. Its transparent and netted form is meant to remind Papuan people to live with integrity in their daily activities. (Interviews with religious-community figures and noken-making mothers, January – February 2023).

c) in cultural context, noken is a mandatory item in traditional wedding ceremonies, including as part of dowry. This sacred craft has enormous historical significance in people’s lives, and it is also used as a symbol of authority during traditional leader inauguration.

Besides, noken also symbolizes tribal peace. By playing a role in various peace-making ceremonies, noken promotes unity among different tribes and fosters a sense of equality through its shared ownership.

d) As a handcraft of the Papuan Indigenous community, the making of noken requires skills and willingness, sincerity, perseverance, and loyalty to achieve satisfying results. This has been the focus of attention passed down from generation to generation among the Indigenous people of Papua. Seven Indigenous communities in West Papua have preserved and maintained their knowledge of crafting noken. Those seven communities are: (1) The indigenous territories of Mamta Jayapura, Sarmi, Kerom and their surrounding areas; (2) The indigenous territories of Saireri Biak, Yapen Waropen and their surrounding areas; (3) The indigenous territories of Domberai Manokwari, Sorong and their surrounding areas; (4) The indigenous territories of Bomberai Fakfak, Kaimana and their surrounding areas; (5) The indigenous territories of Anim-ha Merauke Asmat and their surrounding areas; (6) The indigenous territories of La-pago Jayawijaya Pegunungan Bintang, Puncak Jaya and their surrounding areas; (7) The indigenous territories of Mepago Paniai, Timika, Nabire and their surrounding areas (Interview with community figures, February 13th, 2023).

e) The Papuan people, who lack a tradition of written cultural practices, view noken as a symbol of their oral cultural heritage and living traditions. Noken enriches universal and specific cultural elements with values, meaning, and functions corresponding to their roles and activities in everyday life. (Interview with religious and community figures, February 2023)

f) Noken is a philosophy of life, often referred to as ‘noken of life’. This implies that mama-mama noken have existed among Papuans in the past. Despite different tribes not knowing each other, they shared knowledge on how to weave noken according to their traditions. It was only after having contact with Christian missionaries that the Papuan women, skilled at crafting noken, began to recognize one another as fellow indigenous Papuans. (Interview with religious figure, February 2023).

g) These are the following definitions of noken which have been developing within Papuan society: 1) noken is a woven bag made from fibers of tress, bark, leaves, or stalks, sometimes dyed and ornamented with various decorations, including coloring, to satisfy the inner desires of weavers and noken enthusiasts; 2) noken is a traditional handcraft produced by practically all indigenous tribes in Papua that has been passed down as an intangible cultural element that ensures life’s sustainability by serving as a way to keep, store, and carry things for regular use; 3) noken is a safe and practical container made by hand weaving and braiding that is used to keep and store various goods; 4) noken is a personal container where the ownership of the noken can be identified by the items placed inside; 5) noken is a traditional handcraft of the indigenous customary society in Papua that reflects cultural norms, customs, and ethics passed down through generations; 6) noken is a Papuan traditional handcraft in the form of a bag with a strap that can be worn around the neck or hung from the forehead towards the back. Noken, like a traditional bag, is used to carry daily necessities; 7) noken is a unique traditional Papuan bag made of natural materials such as tree fibers, various types of bark based on tribal traditions, yellow and black orchids, forest rattan, pandan leaves, sago leaves, and nipa leaves, according to the ecology of the natural forest and surrounding geographic conditions (Interview with religious figure, community figure, and mama-mama noken, December 2022).

Workshops, such as the Iwin Miyobo workshop in Jayapura City, have been developed to conserve the sustainability of the noken, particularly the skill of creating the noken. Iwin Miyobo honors the island women... who still weave traditional noken inherited from their ancestors’ cultural heritage at Jayapura City’s iwin Miyobo workshop. ‘Mama-mama noken’, a group of older women, teach younger generations the art of weaving noken. The craft of noken weaving is used as a non-formal, informal, and formal education to preserve intangible cultural heritage or world cultural heritage, which is passed down to school-age children, tourism ambassadors, church youths, and other environmental teenagers as a cultural heritage of Papua that has been promoted to gain global recognition (T. Pekei, 2013; T. C. Pekei, 2008; Benjamin Tukan, 2018).

Meanwhile, the value and meaning of noken for Papuans can be seen as follows: a) Noken is a noken of life, which means that noken is a source of life. Noken is made of natural materials such as bark, tree fibers, swamp grass, pandan leaves, coconut, nipa, and jungle rattan. The Indigenous people of Papua can process materials from the forest and natural environment into noken, a multifunctional bag produced through the knitting or weaving technique that is uniquely handcrafted by the Papuan Indigenous community. b) Noken is a cultural identity that exists within Papua’s culture. Papuan society’s daily activities cannot be separated from the use of noken, which is why noken has become their attribute, marker, and identity. c) Noken serves as a means of livelihood for the Papuan people, which implies that noken has proven to have a high economic value and has become a commodity even at the global level, thus becoming a source of living to ensure the survival of the Papuan people from the past to the present d) Noken is referred to as the ‘second womb’ because after a mother gives birth, noken serves as a container for the growth and development of the child until they begin crawling. The mother creates a special noken for the purpose to train the child’s independence. The child’s belongings are placed in the noken and they are taught to take only what they need. Taking food from someone else’s noken means stealing. At the same time, using their own noken indicates independence. Stealing is regarded as a sin in custom and religion. Therefore, in the understanding of noken tradition, it has become a commandment and prohibition passed down from generation to generation and has been preserved until now (interview with religious figures, community figures, mama-mama noken, December 15th, 2022 & February 23rd, 2023).

Furthermore, noken, as explained by the participants, is a multifunctional object. Noken creates a deep unity and oneness of life among the indigenous population in a theo-ecological or eco-theological sense. Love, faith, and hope are religious values contained in noken. Noken teaches the value of living in community and sharing love to overcome life’s challenges. Noken trains people to live with faith, collaborate with others in making noken, develop faith according to their beliefs, commit to mutual respect without prejudice, and prioritize tolerance in daily life. Noken is regarded as a symbol of God’s love for all Papuans, as God has preserved and nourished the life of Papuan people by providing extraordinary natural resources to be used for their welfare. It is also hoped that the people of Papua can be grateful for and maintain natural resources, local wisdom, and cultural heritage as social capital to live in harmony, peace, tolerance, and faith in God.

Essentially, Indigenous Papuans (Orang Asli Papua) have always used the noken. They consider noken as a container or a living space. Noken, in other words, is a source of life that functions as a multifunctional container. Noken can be filled with necessities of life, store life essentials, and a means of transportation to carry daily necessities.

In religious life, the multifunctional purpose of noken is to facilitate sharing, overcoming, and solving problems with tolerance and mutual respect, fostering tolerance and harmony between religious communities. Religious values embedded in the cultural heritage of the Papuans’ cultural heritage include tolerance towards fellow believers and adherents of different religions. Noken emphasizes religious values, tolerance, kinship, unity, and togetherness. This happened not only recently but since the time of our ancestors. This indicates that noken benefits all generations, past, present, and the future. In other words, noken is an investment in the temporary world, guaranteeing life in the afterlife.

Noken has been around for a long time and is a concept that has been introduced previously. The importance of noken in human life has been taught and passed down from generation to generation, starting from the Papuans’ ancestors who migrated to the land of Papua Island. This tradition continues today, with noken still being an important part of Papuan society (T. C. Pekei, 2008).

The strategy used by the ancestors in instilling religious values and meaning among the Papuan people was through the use of their indigenous languages in various tribe across Papua. The people of Papua refer to and know “Ugatame” as the name of Allah, the Creator of the heavens, and earth and everything within them, including humans who were created in His likeness.

This is done so that noken can be considered as a manifestation of God’s love for humans, particularly the Papuan community. As a result, noken becomes a cultural asset and source of local wisdom uniting the Papuan community while also inspiring them to believe in God (Interview with religious and community figures, February 17th, 2023).

Therefore, noken has become a symbol of cultural identity, a craft item that permeates the source of life, a life under the authority of Ugatame (God the Creator), encompassing all aspects of human survival.

This study confirms the finding of previous studies that cultural symbols can depict a respected presence, playing a significant role in preserving ancestral heritage from one generation to the next generation (Adjri & Rahayu, 2019; Indrastuti, 2018). Described symbols carry information with values and meaning embedded within them. In addition, symbols are often considered as markers of unique conditions based on standards established within a specific society (Liro et al., 2022). Symbols are defined as a form of interpersonal communication and the foundation of society’s cultural features.

The terminology of symbols in this context is defined within the scope of cultural studies. Symbols are understood as a concept with numerous hidden meanings that serve as indicators of a more profound and hidden substance. Symbols exist to display the presence of the object they represent. A symbol is a tangible object seen by the senses whose meaning is a product of human spiritual activity. Symbols emerge as physical manifestations of human thoughts, feelings, and desires (Bayadilova-Altybayeva et al., 2023; Hegy, 2023; Kokosalakis, 2001; Liro et al., 2022). The cultural symbols used in Papuan society in this study are noken and local language.

Noken is recognized by the world as an intangible cultural heritage of Indonesia. It embodies the wisdom and local culture of Papuan society and has a wide range of values and meanings. One of them is that noken denotes the respected and believed presence of a personal entity who stands for and preserves the lives of Papuan society from the past until today. This personal entity is named using the language of the Papuan tribes, namely Ugatame. The knowledge and values of ancestral cultural heritage have always been passed down from generation to generation, teaching that noken is not just a traditional bag made by the Papua women, but it represents Ugatame, who is believed to be the Creator and Protector of the universe, including the lives of Papuans. As a result, this study affirms or confirms prior findings that language is a symbolic aspect of culture (Bayadilova-Altybayeva et al., 2023; Liro et al., 2022).

Language is necessary for humans to communicate with one another. The distinction in values and meaning conveyed through language symbols represent the culture of a particular social group. This is in line with Temirbekov (2005) who asserted that several elements form culture, one of them is language. Language is a crucial element in communication because language has cultural and history dimensions (Trudgill, 2010). This is the result of the historical and cultural development of society, which determines the historical stage of each ethnic group. Language is more than just a symbolic system. The entire culture conveys this system, a great heritage of every nation and an achievement of its history. Culture is embodied in texts, proverbs, and phraseological units that are passed down from generation to generation. Through language, every nation can gain information about the spiritual essence and cultural wealth of its people because language can absorb and passed down the reality, worldview, and customs of the nation from generation to generation as heritage (Bayadilova-Altybayeva et al., 2023; Brauchler, 2014; Hegy, 2023; Liro et al., 2022; Sihombing, 2018).

Language, as a cultural component of an ethnic group's communication space, serves various vital social functions. It combines and multiplies values that contribute to the acquisition of experiences necessary for the formation of an individual. A language develops within the communicative space of an ethnic group.

This study examines the presence and significance of the close relationship between religious, cultural identity, and local wisdom using the perspective of cultural symbols. Symbols convey meanings that are formed in the process of interpretation and direct sensory and emotional perception by the receiver (Bayadilova-Altybayeva et al., 2023; Hegy, 2023). Symbols bridge the gap between the transcendent and immanent realms. Symbols allow humans to express and communicate deep values and meanings in their relationship with the “other” (Sihombing, 2018). According to that statement, noken is a spiritual cultural heritage. Noken is a semantic layer of natural preservation that is also intangible cultural heritage (spiritual).

Culture appears as a synthesis of material and spiritual aspects. The relationship between meaning and symbol determines the inseparable oneness of culture’s spiritual and material parts. As a result, culture is a complex system that combines spiritual and material product that are perceived and used by members of society, and passed down from generation to generation. (Idang, 2018; Liro et al., 2022).

The use of the local language, Ugatame, to refer to Allah shows that language carries ethnocultural values. Moreover, language enables a connection between the past and present and allows ethnic groups to project the development of their culture into the future (Bayadilova-Altybayeva et al., 2023).

CLOSING

This research proves that the existence of noken is more than just a traditional bag made by mama-mama noken using natural raw materials. Noken, on the other hand, has a great spiritual value that has long been lived on by the Papua ancestors and passed down from generation to generation until today’s generation recognizes it. The noken is a cultural symbol representing Allah’s presence and His affection for His people, particularly the Papuan community. The natural blessings of the universe, with all its beauty and abundance, provide a source of livelihood for economic prosperity while also allowing the Papuans to be grateful and faithful to the Creator. The Papuans strongly believe that the continuity of life and the preservation of the homeland nature are made possible through divine protection and love, symbolized in the concept of Ugatame. Ugatame connotes a linguistics expression and embodies a profound cultural value and spiritual significance for the Papua community.

The religious perspective adopted in this study allows for a view of Papuan community policies through the lens of spiritual-religious values. Previously, noken has been positioned as an object in discourse and a commodity with high economic value. However, this perspective enables the examination of the roles of religious and cultural figures in the community, including the relationship between religious and spiritual values and noken.

The finding has enriched the discursive studies on the prominent role and significance of cultural symbols, local wisdom, religious values, and meanings in human life. The ability of ethnic groups to maintain their existence by utilizing their cultural strengths is crucial. Teaching the noble values of life through the cultural heritage to the younger generations is an effective strategy. The richness of values and meanings embedded in the local wisdom of Papuan ethnic groups can be preserved and maintained. As demonstrated in the context of this study, noken, as local cultural heritage of Papuan society, is reflected and deeply... interpreted as a symbol of representation of God’s love.

Since this research only examined noken made by mama-mama noken in Iwin Miyobo workshop in Jayapura city with limited religious and community figures, further research is required to include more comprehensive participants from all noken-making workshops in Papua. Therefore, the obtained information and insight about noken in the life of Papuan communities as a source of local wisdom, cultural, and prosperity, which has received international recognition as an intangible cultural heritage, revealing invaluable values and meanings in life, is expected to be more varied and comprehensive.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENT

My deepest gratitude to Mr. Adison, reviewer, the translator of this article until it is published in this journal, Al-Qalam. Also, I thank the editorial teams for accepting this article to be published. I hope I can continue sharing knowledge about noken so that it is widely and scientifically socialized in days to come.
